Mr. EDITOR :- Some four or five years ago, several articles appeared in the Advertiser, under the heading "Did Shakespeare write Shakespeare." This query made some laugh and others sneer. While the writer doubtless believed that William Shakespeare was the real and veritable author of the plays attributed to him, still, he may have found it difficult to reconcile the man Shakspeare, as known in history, with the im-The writer of those articles was not the only one who has been perplexed in reviewing this A Lion and Lioness or Cubs, subject. Coleridge, Emerson, Carlyle, and other great critics have been perplexed beyond measure to account for the wonderful fact, that a man such as Shakespeare is reported to have been, could possibly have written "Hamlet," "Othello," "Macbeth," and his other plays.

This enigms is fully described in Professor Nathaniel Holmes' work on "The authorship of Shakespeare." Professor Holmes is now connected with the Law School of Cambridge University, and was formerly a judge in Missouri This book may be regarded as a good example of "special pleading," but it is, nevertheless, richly meriting a careful perusal, by any one who desires to read upon a subject of this nature. The following paragraphs afford a good illustration of the character of the book :

"The German critic, Schlegel, equally amazed at the extent of the knowledge and the depth of the philosophy of these plays of Shakespeare. the author of which he could not but consider as one who had mustered 'all the things and relations of this world,' does not heartate to declare the received account of his life to be 'a mere fabulous story, a blind and extravagant error': this Shakespeare must have been another sort of man from what we know him. The Germans seems to have been the first to discover and appreciate the full depth of his philosophy, not excepting Gervinus, who appears to have had less difficulty about the author himself. That a single passage, which had never attracted the particuas a brilliant figure of speech, should be capable of creating whole books in the soul of Jean Paul Richer, is, perhaps, not much to be wondered at ; especially, if we consider that he, to whose great learning, deep philosophy, and divine wisdom, this universe became crystaline and transparent, did not fail to see that no one had 'better pursped and illumined the actual truth of things, even into the deepest vales and the little worms therein, than those twin-stars of poesy, Homer and Shakespeare.

on his arrival in London, at the age of twentythree, with only such a history as we possess of his previous life, education, studies, and pursuits, could have begun almost immediately to produce the matchless works which we know by his name, not merely the most masterly works of art, and as such in the opinion of eminent critics, surpassing the Greek tragedy itself, but classical poems, and plays the most profoundly philosophical in critic than Goethe has awarded this high praise). may justly strike us as simply preposterous and absurd. 'What!' exclaims Coleridge, at this consequence of the traditional biography, 'are we to have miracles in sport? * * * Does God choose idiots by whom to convey divine truths to man?" Emerson, no less, considering that the Shakespeare Society had ascertained that this William Shakespeare was 'n good natured sort not in any striking manner distinguished from other actors and managers,' and that he was 'a veritable farmer' withal, engaged in all sorts of traffic at Stratford, doing business commissions in London, and suing Phillip Rogers for malt dedispair, with this significant confession: 'I cannot marry this fact to his verse. Other admirable men have led lives in some sort of keeping with their thought; but this man, in wide co trast ' In like manner Jean Paul Richter ' would have him buried, if his life were like his writings, with Pythagoras, Plato, Socrates, and the highest nobility of the human race, in the same best congregated earth of our globe, God's flower-gar-den in the deep north.' Indeed, considering how this man should drop the theatre as an idle pastime, or as a trade that has filled his coffers, and quietly sit him down for the remainder of life werely to talk and jest with the Stratford burghers, and, turning over his works to the spoiling hand of blundering printers and surreptitions traffic, regardless of his own reputation, heedless of the w orld around him, leaving his manuscripts to perish, taking no thought of foreign nations, or the next ages, or as if not deeming he had written anything worthy of preservation, should 'ateal in silence to his grave,' beneath a doggerel epitaph reputed to have been written by himself, and certainly suitable enough for his * bones,' by the side of which the knowing friends who erected a monoment over him caused to be inscribed a Latin memento, which might indeed do bonor to the memory of the 'Star of Poets':-

Judicio Pyllium, genio Socratem, arte Maroi Term tegit, populus meret, Olympus habet any man might wonder, if he did not laugh outright, to see this Son of Momus wearing thus his lion's ekin even in his tomb. Carlyle, that other master-critic of our time, chewing the cud of this who, Prometheus-like, will scale Heaven (if it so must be), and is satisfied if he therewith pay the rent of his London Play-house, as it were, with the imperturbability of Teufelsdroch himself, sim-ply breaks out, at last, with this brief exclamation: 'An unparalleled mortal.'
